Our Brand is Crisis: Legal Education at the Crossroads

The appeal of a legal education, so conventional wisdom holds, is a lifetime of stable employment, generous salary, and the ability to “make a difference” in society. For years, this compelling narrative drew some of the most inquisitive minds around, allowing law schools to steadily raise tuition and maintain a successful business operating model built upon rankings and prestige. Yet, if recent history is any indication, pervasive student disaffection, tepid job prospects, and a precipitous decline in law school applications—even at the some of the nation’s most storied programs—underscores a sobering reality that employers and practitioners have long lamented: from whence will the next generation of lawyers arise? This opening panel offers a pointed yet hopeful take on the state (and future) of legal education as seen from a diverse panel of distinguished professionals.

10:45am – 12:00pm Training the 21st Century Lawyer: Envisioning a Public-Private Alliance
Although traditional academic curricula is intended to help law students identify problems in the surrounding world, the impinging forces of globalization, scientific advancement, and geopolitical tumult have underscored a profound disconnect between business needs in the current economy and the preparedness of today's law school graduates. Training to become a successful lawyer in the twenty-first century requires a far more diverse, less theoretical apprenticeship designed to accelerate one's transition to the workforce. This session examines several innovative partnerships between law schools and law firms that have helped position newly-minted lawyers in good stead.

A Call to Action: The Role of Law Schools in Access to Justice

One of the legal profession's greatest tragedies is the ongoing inability of low income people to seek legal representation or support. Indeed, according to the Brennan Center for Justice, eighty percent of low income families fall victim to the so-termed "justice gap," thus resulting in widespread financial and emotional losses felt in local communities and beyond. As shepherds of the next generation, law schools play a critical role in alleviating this alarming predicament. Please join us as James J. Sandman of Legal Services Corporation explains how truly to effect meaningful change.

Brave New World: Advancing Educational Reform Around Legal Technology

Legal technology's transformative qualities cannot be understated. As many legal clients continue to think globally when it comes to running a successful business, customer expectations around more efficient, cost-effective legal service have yielded a veritable sea change in the legal marketplace favoring lawyers with technological acumen. Expanding upon arguments in the preceding panel, this conversation offers a comprehensive take on where formal education around emergent technology fits within law school curricula. Our panel will ponder how best to prepare the next generation of lawyers for the myriad challenges ahead.

A Law School Performance Report Card: A Conversation about Education, Rankings, and What Matters in Entry-Level Hiring

Law schools are often criticized by law firm leaders for failing to provide practical or relevant training. Yet, when individual law schools create innovative programs related to technology, business, or hands-on clinical training, law firms are unmoved, continuing their reliance on U.S. News rankings when selecting schools for OCI and making hiring decisions. At the same time, large corporate legal departments are expressing growing dissatisfaction with the value they are getting from their outside counsel, often because of gaps in either hard or soft skills. Is it possible to get alignment between clients, legal service providers, and law schools on what matters?
